Admission is FREE.

Join Danish performance artist Annika Lewis, director B. Stanley and members of Theater Du Jour for a series of discussions and working demonstrations focused on creative process, collaboration and the differing artistic climate in the United States and Scandinavia. Lewis, a performer and producer who travels extensively in Europe and the U.S., brings her unique perspective to this series as she interacts with Theatre Du Jour, Washington's oldest experimental theatre group. Now engaged in a three-year collaboration to create a new performance together, they will discuss topics such as process, types of collaboration, difficulties of working internationally, and mining for ideas and inspiration. Some sessions will include working demonstrations centered around their current work as well as video presentations of past and current performances. The atmosphere will be relaxed and engaging, with audience questions and participation welcome. A must for performers who create their own works, who are trying to book performances on their own, or who are intrigued by the idea of collaborating with other artists.
